St. Patrick.

A new translation of St. Patrick's "Confesssion" has just been completed by the Irish scholars, Drs Stokes and Wright, of Tripity College, Dublin. The "Confession" is acknowledged by historians to be the work of St. Patrick's own pen, and a copy from the original is in the "Book of Armagh," one of the treasures of Trinity College. The Rev. Dr. John Hall speaks of the new translation in the Christian Observer

"The majority of the critics make his birthplace Kilpatrick, near Dumbarton, on the Clyde, Scotland; so the widely scattered Scotch-Irish have a double interest in the man. His birth was about the year 395 and the brginning of his work was about 440. He lived to be an old man, but the date of He lived to be an old man, but the date of his death is uncertain. He was carried away captive, according to the "Confession" at the age of sixteen. He was sold to an Irish chieftain called Milcho. There he cared for cattle for six years, his early religious teaching hearing fruit until after six gious teaching bearing fruit, until after six years, directed, he believed, from above, he made his escape. After many perils, and eight or nine weeks again passed in the hands of captors, he reached his friends. Nothing is known of him from the "Confession," or from any credible authority, till he began his mission. The style of his quotation shows that he did not know the Latin Vulgate, but that he did know an edition of Scripture, from which he makes frequent quotations, often, it would seem, from memory. He is not the only Scotchman with this babit. His efforts in Ireland were mainly directed to the heads of clans, knowing, doubtless, that this was the best way to reach the people. He had many difficulties, but the success was marked according to the standard of the time, when many accepted Christianity as a whole yet retained, in a degree, their old manners and customs, and did not attain to very definite doctrinal knowledge. To the right understanding of many of the statements of historians of this remote period, it is needful to remember that the Irish were then called 'Scots,' and that in the years A. D. 343-369 they ravaged and ruled for ten years a part of the present Great Britain. A care ful reading of the 'Confession,' with its ac count of his experience, decision to work for Ireland, personal efforts, shows that he had no commission from the Bishop of Rome. That he should have it and hold his peace about it is incredible. The worship of the Virgin Mary, of saints, of images, has no place in his writings. Confession to him and absolution are never alluded count of his experience, decision to work no place in his writings. Confession to him and absolution are never alluded to. He does speak, sagain and again, of his baptising, but nothing of such 'sacraments' as extreme unction. His one authority for his teaching is the Word of God. Purgatory, transsubstantiation and Papal authority are never alluded to, On the other hand the spirit of his teaching, his saying of personal lowliness, and of depensense of personal lowliness, and of dependence on the grace of God, are very like the experiences recorded by David Brainerd and Henry Martyn. This great man was not a 'Protestant,' only because the church had not then become (though there were germs of evil in some places) what Savonarola, Wickliffe, Lether and their associates found it. Here is the opening sentence of Patrick's confession: 'I, Patrick, a sinner, the rudest and the least of all the faithful, and most contemptible to very many, had for my father Calpurnius, a deacon, a son of Potitus, a Presbyter, who dwelt in the village of Bannavem Tabernacle; for he had a small

BOULANGER'S POPULARITY .- The source of General Boulauger's popularity has puzzled a good many people, but the Paris paper, La France, throws some light on the question.
